To: All Parents/Carers

Dear Parents/Carers

It is with much regret that I am writing with some very sad news about one of our members of the King's Oak staff. Mr Christopher Ewing, a member of our English department, passed away on Friday afternoon from cancer. His death was not unexpected but nevertheless this is very sad news for his family, colleagues and the many students he taught over the 17 years he worked at King's Oak.

Mr Ewing was a well-known figure in the school and built particularly strong relationships in the English department and across the Cabot Learning Federation. Mr Ewing enjoyed promoting his love of English literature and poetry in the classroom and was also highly regarded by staff and students for supporting the King's Oak community.

With the school closed to students, may I ask that you pass on this sad news to your child/ren. In the normal way of things, we would be supporting children in school with this. If your child would like to talk to someone at school, I suggest that they or you contact the Heads of House team or Nicky Baker (koaheadsofhouse@clf.uk / nichola.baker@clf.uk). Additionally, attached to this letter there is advice from Cruse Bereavement Care for parents on supporting children who experience bereavement.

Over the coming weeks, we will make plans to honour the memory of Mr Ewing and the years of outstanding service he gave to the school. For now, our priority is to respond sensitively and thoughtfully to the family of Mr Ewing and the staff and students he worked closely with.

Please do not hesitate to contact us if you have any questions or concerns about this matter.

Yours sincerely

Katherine Ogden

Understanding bereavement

After someone dies

The death of someone close can be one of the hardest things we have to deal with.

There is no normal or 'right' way to grieve. How you react will depend on many things – who died and how, age and experience, personality and culture or religion.

Over time feelings usually become less intense, but you can't predict when it will happen, or force it to come sooner. There's no set timetable for starting to feel better. But eventually most people feel able to cope with their lives, whilst remembering those who have died.

Cruse can help

This leaflet gives some information about bereavement, and some advice that may help you look after yourself or a child in your care.

If as time goes on you find that you are struggling to cope, you can contact Cruse Bereavement Care for more support.

What you may feel

There are no set stages or phases of grief which everyone goes through. But some feelings are very common.

- In the early days you may feel shocked and numb, or you may feel nothing at all.
- The pain can be overwhelming, and you may experience waves of intense feelings or mood swings. It's common to find yourself going over and over events.
- You may find yourself searching for the person who has died. It's normal to see the person, feel their presence or talk to them.
- You may feel guilty about things which happened before the death, or about how you feel now.
- You may feel very angry with yourself or others, or with the person who has died.
- You may have trouble sleeping or need to sleep more than usual. You may feel sick or panicky.
- As time goes on you may have strong feelings of longing, sadness, loneliness and sometimes hopelessness and fear about the future.

"Everyone experiences grief differently, and there is no timeline for grief."

Children's grief

Children's understanding of grief and their reactions will depend on their age.

- A very young child might not understand that death is permanent.
- An older child or teenager may use denial to help them cope.
- Children may seem to dip in and out of grief – this doesn't mean they don't care.

Supporting a child or young person

- Tell them what has happened using clear language. Check their understanding, and let them talk and ask questions.
- Reassure them that they are still loved.
- It's OK to let them see that you're sad too.
- Let them join in with funerals and memorials, but be led by them.
- Talk to their school and make sure other adults involved in their care know what has happened.

"Children experience grief differently."

Looking after yourself

It's important that you take care of yourself following a bereavement.

Treat yourself gently

Take one day at a time and give yourself permission to grieve. Don't feel guilty or weak if you're struggling to cope, or need help.

Talk to someone

Talking can be really helpful. Often family or friends can help. You might also be able to talk to someone in your community, or to a faith or spiritual leader. Talk to your GP if your health is suffering.

Diet and sleep

It's easier said than done, but try to eat properly and get enough rest (even if you can't sleep). People who use drugs and alcohol usually find any relief is only temporary.

Routine

Sometimes it helps to develop a new routine of eating, sleeping and connecting with others.

Exercise

Even a short walk to get some fresh air can help.

Coping with trauma and loss

Coping with trauma and loss

Someone close to you may have died in sudden and/or traumatic circumstances. You may have witnessed the death, or the deaths and injury of others. This leaflet explains some common reactions and sources of help.

What you may experience

Bereavement and trauma affect people in different ways. Everyone's experience and responses will be individual to them. There is no right or 'normal' response.

The following are some of the reactions and feelings that you may experience in the hours, days, weeks and months after a traumatic event. It is common to experience some or all of these feelings and reactions. You may experience them immediately or some time later.

The feelings can be very strong and frightening. It can feel as if you are losing control or 'going mad'. These are normal reactions but if you find that they are continuing and affecting your ability to cope with daily life and your relationships with others, contact your GP or a support organisation.

Feelings

Fear

You may feel frightened:

- of being left alone
- of 'breaking down' or 'losing control'
- of a similar event happening again
- of going to particular places that recall the event
- for your own safety
- for the safety of those close to you.

A sound or smell may remind you of the event, and this can be very frightening.

You may experience panic attacks.

Sadness

You may feel sadness:

- about this death
- about other deaths, injuries and losses.

Longing

You may feel a sense of longing:

- for things that have gone
- for things that can never happen now.

Guilt

You may feel guilty:

- for being better off than others who you think have suffered more
- for being alive, or not injured
- for not having done more to protect or save other people
- for things you have said and done or not said and done in relation to the dead person.

Shame

You may feel a strong sense of shame:

- for being seen to be helpless, 'emotional' and needing others
- for not having reacted/behaved as you would have wished.

Anger

You may feel angry:

- about what has happened
- with whoever caused it or allowed it to happen
- about the injustice and senselessness of it
- about other people's lack of understanding
- about other people's perceived mistakes or failures.

Numbness

You may feel numb. The event may seem unreal, like a dream. You may feel that it has not really happened, or that it is happening to someone else.

Emptiness/hopelessness about the future

You may feel empty and hopeless about the future. You may feel that life is not worth living. You may even feel that you want to end your own life, or to harm yourself.

Thoughts

Traumatic loss and grief can also affect your thinking and the way your brain works.

Memories

You may experience repeated and intrusive thoughts and memories of those who have died or been injured or the event itself. You may find yourself constantly recalling other bereavements and losses.

Inability to concentrate

The stress and your preoccupation with the experience may affect your ability to focus on the here-and-now. You may have poor concentration, which can make you more accident prone. You may feel jumpy, restless and anxious.

Reconstructing/questioning the event

You may find yourself going over the event, reconstructing it so that it comes out differently. You may be constantly asking yourself 'why?' – why me? why them? why did it happen?

Dreams and Flashbacks

You may experience recurring dreams and nightmares.

You may find yourself repeatedly re-experiencing the trauma through unwanted images or flashbacks.

Behaviours

You may find yourself crying more frequently than before, or crying in situations that wouldn't normally be seen as an occasion for tears.

You may find yourself doing things you haven't done before, such as:

- drinking alcohol excessively or taking drugs – alcohol or drugs may dull the pain, but only temporarily
- avoiding situations, objects or people who remind you of the event or the person who has died.

Physical reactions

You may experience physical reactions to the trauma, such as loss of appetite, difficulty sleeping, increased heart rate, stomach upsets and exhaustion. These symptoms usually pass but consult your doctor if they persist.

People who have experienced bereavement are often more vulnerable to physical illnesses following their loss.

Impact on relationships

Relationships with family, friends and colleagues will be affected. Some people are able to support one another, but others may struggle. It can be difficult for people to understand what you have experienced and are going through. A crisis can bring people together, but it can also create tensions and strains. You may feel isolated, despite the presence of family and friends. You may find that you want to be left on your own or to be with a few select people who know what has happened.

Children and young people

Children and young people will experience similar feelings as adults, but each in their own, unique way.

- Try to acknowledge their feelings/grief.
- Answer their questions honestly and fully to try to help them understand what has happened.
- Give them extra reassurance and affection.
- Recognise that they may need time to be quiet and alone.
- Accept that they may also sometimes behave in ways that might be considered inappropriate in an adult, such as being very boisterous, and playing.
- Allow them to choose whether they want to take part in the funeral or other commemorative event.
- Inform their school about what has happened, and make sure school staff are able to offer support.

At times you may feel too traumatised yourself to be able to offer support to your children. Ask for help from trusted friends and relatives if you feel you need it.

What can you do?

It is important to try to take each day at a time and to do what you know is right for you. Everyone has their own way of grieving and coping with loss. These are some general suggestions about what can help.

Look after yourself

Don't expect too much of yourself. Give yourself time to grieve, to acknowledge what has happened and to heal. Try to be kind to yourself. Do things and be with people that you find helpful and avoid those you find unhelpful. Get enough sleep and try to eat well.

Accept support with everyday tasks if you think it will help – although some people find it a relief to have ordinary, daily tasks to distract them. Set yourself small, realistic goals. Try to keep to familiar routines that give a sense of order and control. This also applies to children: try to keep their usual day and bedtime routines.

Don't be afraid of sharing emotions. Don't be ashamed or embarrassed about crying.

Do things that help you relax – a massage, a walk in the park, listen to music. Try not to cut yourself off from friends, family, work colleagues and neighbours.

Talk about it

Many people find it helpful to talk about what has happened and how they feel, over and over again. This can be an important part of the healing process. Find someone you can talk to – a friend, someone who has had similar experiences, your GP, a counsellor or bereavement support organisation.

Accepting the reality

Attending the funeral, returning to the scene of the incident and talking to people who were also there or who know what happened can all help the reality of what has happened to sink in, which can aid the grieving and recovery process.

Seek help and support

Seek help and support from family, friends and colleagues, faith organisations/groups or from support organisations such as Cruse Bereavement Care.

It is particularly important to seek help from your GP if disturbing behaviours or emotions have continued for more than six to eight weeks or if they are making it difficult for you to function at home, work or school.

Cruse can help

Cruse Bereavement Care has a network of local branches in England, Northern Ireland and Wales, and a national helpline.

We provide:

- telephone helpline and email support
- one-to-one, face-to-face bereavement support and counselling for adults, young people and children
